Established in 1894, Eichenkranz is a German Restaurant rich in history. Eichenkranz means oak wreath in English. Many immigrants settled in Southeast Baltimore. One such immigrant, Philip Wagner founded a German social club/singing society on March 18, 1894. This was not a school, but a glorified dance hall. A meeting place for recreation and socialization, the Eichenkranz would frequently perform there with its 30 voice choir. They were excellent and won numerous state, local and national competitions. On November 16, 1939 the Eichenkranz was incorporated and opened its doors in a newly built residence for them at 611 South Fagley St. It was a two story brick and mortar building with large glass block windows. The first floor contained a full kitchen that served food and sported a bar and restrooms. In the approaching years many of the original members passed away and so the club's membership dwindled over the years. But the restaurant aspect of the Club flourished serving the community with its fine German cuisine. The Club ultimately disbanded, giving its club treasury to the Baltimore Kickers, another area German Club. The building was sold and the restaurant and the name carried on. It was by this time a landmark restaurant in the city of Baltimore. The restaurant Eichenkranz flourished from the 1930's to the seventies when it became the Kozy Inn. The establishment reopened as Eichenkranz in 1985. Several owners and after another closing it was resurrected in 1990 by the present owners, Harold and Audrey Bowles. The building was remodeled and opened its doors on September 21, 1991.
